Choosing abortion: Teens who make the decision without parental involvement

In the landmark case of Roe v. Wade, the Supreme Court assumed both that pregnant teens lack the capacity to make the abortion decision for themselves, and that parental involvement serves as a beneficial constraint on young women. Since the decision, the Court has reversed itself on this last element, holding that the decision to terminate a pregnancy is within the rights of a minor, and the role of parents to give their consent is a capacity to be exercised by the young woman herself rather than by others. The Court also held that the role of parents to give their consent is a capacity to be exercised by the young woman herself rather than by others. The Court's reasoning in Roe v. Wade was based on the belief that young women should be free to make their own reproductive decisions, and that parental involvement should not interfere with their ability to do so. The Court argued that parental involvement would only serve to undermine the autonomy of young women and to prevent them from exercising their right to choose.

However, the Court's reasoning in Roe v. Wade has been criticized by some for being too narrow in its focus on the reproductive rights of young women. Many critics argue that the Court's decision was too focused on the issue of abortion, and that it failed to consider the broader issues of reproductive justice and women's rights.
